The islands of the interior of the plateau are wasting; the inner banks appear to be all of the same height; and from the bridge we could see no indications, from the discoloration of the water, of banks growing up or having come near the surface. The crescentic islands on the eastern face of the northern part of Tiladummati show this process of growth admirably, and there we can readily trace the development of a large single island from two smaller islands placed at each extremity of the atoll. On Wataru (PI. 34, fig. 2; 35, fig. 1), to the northeast of Karema, a large island occupies the southern rim of the faro. The vegetation of the island is poor; most of it is dead or dying, the sand and shingle of the high steep beaches having been blown far in between the trees through the outer belt of...
