Gloom descends on the nation like a shroud. The government is in disarray; nobody agrees with anybody else and nothing gets done. Foreign powers are keeping a gleeful deathwatch and are eager to pounce. If you are like many Americans who cannot shake the heartbreaking feeling that America is indeed in a precipitous downslide, you need to read this book. Written by an immigrant, America: Myths vs. Realities – How Freedom Forms Habits of the American Heart is an unabashed encomium of the American experience. It delves deep into the very roots of the American republic, tracing America's founding principles all the way back to Enlightenment philosophers's laborious anatomy of human understanding and Constitutional framers's genius application of the revolutionary insights gained from such anatomy. While tackling such weighty and often dense issues, the book nevertheless chooses to present its arguments through illustrative and engrossing stories gleaned from American history and modern American life. Instead of being intimidated by some of the subject matters, all readers should let the power of the narration take over and be drawn to the inexorable conclusion that the American system, being founded with a clear understanding of, and a wide open eye to, all aspects of human nature, has an unshakable base and "shall not perish from the earth." And indeed, it shall always overcome temporary difficulties and prosper.

This outline for the book contains 15 short essays that encapsulate the essence of the book. For those who have no use for Chinese translation in this bilingual version, there is also an English version available.

Samuel Y. Shu is a Chinese immigrant and has spent most of his quarter-century American life researching and living this book. The book was originally intended for a Chinese audience but as American and Chinese fortunes shift in the past years, he is convinced that Americans, and others, have an urgent need for the book as well. His writings, variously anthologized, have appeared in numerous American and Asian newspapers and magazines in such forms as news reports, features, opinion columns, guest commentaries, and editorials. He holds post graduate diplomas in English and American Literature, Economics, Law and Diplomacy, and Journalism from American institutions.
